Reviewer's Comment for Publication.

The manuscript addresses a relevant sociological topic by examining intergenerational differences in social values, beliefs, and attitudes. It is well organized, presents clear objectives and research questions, and draws on relevant theoretical perspectives, including Mannheim's theory of generations, socialization theory, and intergenerational value transmission. The discussion effectively explores the influence of education, economic conditions, family structure, technology, cultural traditions, and media on generational perspectives. The paper appropriately emphasizes that generational differences are not universal and can provide opportunities for mutual learning, cultural continuity, and social cooperation. However, the methodology would benefit from greater detail regarding the literature selection and analysis process. The manuscript should also strengthen critical engagement with the cited studies, clarify its original contribution, and integrate the theoretical frameworks more explicitly into the discussion. Careful verification of references, citation consistency, and minor language and formatting improvements are recommended. Overall, the manuscript has academic relevance and may be considered for publication after minor revision.
