Detailed Reviewer's Report

This paper looks at how Kenya is executing its obligations regarding free movement within the EAC through original information provided by the organisations that handle migration. It uses both policy analysis and empirical evidence to investigate the relationship between the obligations and the actions of the country in question. The theory that suggests that while access becomes easy, the right to work and stay becomes harder is a good insight into this area. The language used, however, can be complex for those who view the issue from a legal standpoint.

To improve the paper, the author could (1) shorten and simplify the literature review and methodology to bring the focus to the main argument, (2) separate findings from discussion so the discussion explains the meaning of the results rather than repeating them and (3) edit the language and clarify tables and statistics for easier reading.
