Detailed Reviewer's Report

Overall Evaluation

The manuscript, "An Analytical Study of the Attitude of Commerce and Management Students toward Entrepreneurship as a Career Choice: A Review," addresses a relevant and important issue in the field of entrepreneurship education. The topic is particularly significant because entrepreneurship is increasingly promoted as an alternative career option for young graduates. The manuscript discusses several important factors influencing students' entrepreneurial attitudes, including educational background, family support, financial resources, risk-taking ability, awareness, practical exposure and government initiatives. The manuscript is generally well organized and the objectives are clearly stated. However, the paper requires substantial improvement before it can be considered for publication. The major concern is the methodological positioning of the study. The manuscript describes itself as a review based on secondary sources, but it also refers specifically to Commerce and Management students in Amravati District. The authors should clearly establish whether the paper is a systematic/literature review or an empirical study.

Strengths

- The topic is relevant to current entrepreneurship and higher education research.
- The manuscript clearly identifies the major factors affecting students' entrepreneurial career preferences.
- The objectives are clearly presented and broadly aligned with the topic.

REVIEWER'S REPORT

- The discussion highlights the importance of entrepreneurship education and institutional support.
- The paper has practical relevance for educators, policymakers and entrepreneurship development agencies.
- The manuscript recognizes important barriers such as financial risk, lack of practical exposure and fear of failure.
- The focus on Commerce and Management students provides a useful academic context.

Areas for Improvement

Methodology: The methodology needs greater clarity. The manuscript states that it is based on existing literature and secondary data, but the geographical focus on Amravati District creates confusion. The authors should clearly explain how the literature was selected, the period covered, databases used and criteria for including or excluding studies.

Review of Literature: The literature review should be more analytical rather than simply presenting individual studies. Recent research should be incorporated, particularly studies published during the last five years. The authors should identify similarities, differences and research gaps in previous studies.

Theoretical Framework: The manuscript would be stronger if it were supported by an appropriate theoretical framework, such as the Theory of Planned Behavior (TPB) or another established entrepreneurship intention model. The relationship between attitude, perceived behavioural control, subjective norms and entrepreneurial intention should be discussed where relevant.

Conceptual Clarity: The terms entrepreneurial attitude, entrepreneurial intention, entrepreneurship as a career choice and entrepreneurial behaviour should be clearly distinguished. At present, some of these concepts appear to be used interchangeably.

Analysis and Discussion: Since the paper is a review, the authors should provide stronger synthesis of the reviewed studies. Instead of only stating that students have positive or negative attitudes, the paper should explain why these attitudes differ and what factors appear to be most influential.

Amravati District Focus: If Amravati District remains in the title and objectives, the authors should provide sufficient evidence specifically related to that geographical context. If no primary data are collected from Amravati students, the title and objectives may need to be modified to reflect the review nature of the paper.

References: The references should be updated with recent peer-reviewed journal articles. All citations and references should follow a consistent APA 7th edition format. Wherever possible, DOI information should be provided.

Language and Presentation: Some sentences require grammatical correction and improvement in academic style. Formatting should also be made consistent throughout the manuscript, particularly headings, spacing, terminology and references.

Limitations and Contribution: A separate section explaining the limitations of the review would strengthen the paper. The authors should also clearly state the research contribution or novelty of the manuscript.
